TAX UPDATE

1. Taxpayers Need to Hold RFM Units until Age of 55 Years to Get Extra Tax Deduction

In an effort to encourage Thai people to save and invest more for their retirement, the government in 2001 introduced the retirement mutual fund, in which an individual taxpayer will get an extra tax deduction for the amount invested in the retirement mutual fund up to Baht 300,000 or 15% of the earned income, under the condition that the individual taxpayer had to maintain his investments in the retirement mutual fund until the age of 55 years old.

Contrary to what the government had anticipated, the retirement mutual funds grew rather too slowly in part due to the 55 year old holding period requirement. With a view of promoting further growth for the retirement mutual funds, the Ministry of Finance in 2004 relaxed the condition from the 55 year old holding period to the full 5 year holding period. Since then there has been a considerable confusion in the mutual fund industry and among the investing public whether a unit holder in the retirement mutual fund has to keep his or her investment until the age of 55 years old or the end of 5 years. Even though the Revenue Department has firmly issued the Revenue Rulings in support of the full 5 year holding period as the condition for receiving an extra tax deduction, most, if not all, of asset management companies still advised the investing public that maintaining the investments in retirement mutual funds until at the age of 55 years old was the condition for receiving an extra tax deduction.

Now, the Cabinet just approves the draft of the Ministerial Regulation issued by virtue of the Revenue Code to change the required holding period for retirement mutual funds from the full 5 years to the age of 55 years old.
